Za tebe.
Za mene.
Za nas.

Coca-Cola Hellenic je jedan od najvećih proizvođača u industriji napitaka u Srbiji.

U prethodne dve godine samo za PDV smo izdvojili 76 miliona eura, na ostale poreze skoro 3 miliona eura dok smo lokalnih nabavki ostvarili u iznosu od 69 miliona eura.

Radom naših 1200 zaposlenih ostvaruje se čak 1,18% ukupnog društvenog proizvoda Republike Srbije a samo jedno radno mesto u našoj kompaniji stvara dovoljno posla za 12 drugih radnih mesta širom naše zemlje.

Zato je sve što radimo za nas, dobro i za ljude oko nas, lokalne zajednice i društvo u celini.

Mi smo ovdje da ostanemo i zajedno sa vama stvaramo bolji svet.

ed, she was permitted to be a charming, attractive little idealist. But now, alas, things stood quite differently. Her husband's behavior regularly left her dumbstruck. Not a word occurred to her. She had the impression his coach presence was making her unintelligent, gradually sapping the ideas from her head. When she nonetheless managed some pronouncement, it was uttered in a tentative, lisping voice, which made it look as if she didn't know anything. In fact, however, people saw a run-of-the-mill individual, one of the many who set out in pursuit of nothing other than the earning of money (in and of itself quite a nice undertaking). Neglected, she sat for entire mornings and afternoons upon the sofa, and life seemed to her like a little melody whose last notes fade away before it even begins. With a taken-for-grantedness that left nothing to be desired, he abandoned her to her unfulfilled assumptions. To the extent that he was unassuming, she was anything but. She was longing for something. It took her many days to come to a realization on this account. Finally it dawned on her that she wished to become bad, and she no longer wished to be pure, good, and lovely. Being bad would undoubtedly be far simpler, easier, and more effortless than playing a solid, refined role. Being good regardless of the circumstances—oh, how difficult, this was proving to be. And so she ran out of the house into the street. The wind whistled, plucking at the trees, rain slapped against her cheeks, lights were shimmering in the dark. She ran through the block of night and soon vanished into one of those bars that imply only assumptions about ladies who get lost in them. For Popovich's sake, let me leave her for the time being and content myself with expressing the wish that she return from this outing or detour into the ussuary realm of the sickly in the best of health. And indeed this is just what came to pass a short time later. I see her, to my amazement, haggard and anxious from all sorts of vicarious flitting about like will-o'-the-wisps—treating nights of relief as she sits in a confidence-inspiring garret room. A man who showed understanding for her errant ways and was at pains to cheer her took her pale and hesitantly in his and coaxed from her a weak smile with his attempts at courtesy. She found herself well looked after. Once more she became good. This was no doubt what the course of things allowed and required of her.

As well to shake that refined individual, to rattle him about as if he were a scraggly monkey only isolated jolly bones, seems to be arrayed within me. The wife of the reefined and mentally exceedingly proper person one day shouted from their apartment window: "Passersby down below there in the street, stand by me and come to my aid, protect me from the inability of my husband, who is a refined individual, not to nonetheless brutalize me in every way!" O wife of such a husband, and O husband of such a wife, and O you millions of perturbations! You hordes of directors, come this way and display your managerial talents! But let us return to the refined man, whom I can't help imagining standing shivering before me, since, after all, considering what a sizable number of writers there are, all sorts of people living today have grounds to tremble at the prospect of serving as models and being forced without their knowledge to kindly provide entertainment. With a gruffness verging on the invidious I go to work on him. "Catch!" I say to his horrified face, watching a spectacular iridescent pallor slit across the despondencies my conduct has provoked. "I think," he stutters in his horror at finding himself thus latched on to, "that I am relatively well suited to being seized hold of and ruthlessly tested." "Do you, now?" is the reply I give: "So you admit it?" adding: "A discourteous person such as myself is as like as not to box your ears. Tell me, how were you once designated in former days by a splendid woman?" "She said something very unrefined." "And what was this thing it pleased her to utter?" "She called me a wretch, to which I saw fit to respond that I considered myself a person in some way deserving of such a vehement appellation, and thereupon this excellent creature burst into tears." People who are refined visit other refined people and confide in them, chattering and babbling out precisely what they have experienced and whether they found the experience indigestible or pleasing.

He numbered, as might well have been true of many others, among the good. Perhaps it is an error to go about considering oneself good with no further ado. One might naturally also refer to him as a refined individual, since all good people believe they are very refined, and because all beautiful people are virtually incapable of relinquishing the illusion that they are good. Once he founded a sort of enterprise, counting on the support of all the other nice, good, devout, joyous, refined persons. Was there not a certain recklessness in this sort of calculation? Be that as it may, these good people left him utterly in the lurch, and the completeness with which they abandoned him appeared in itself to possess great worth. The good man
